Introduction When IBM ran into financial trouble the early 1990s, the company brought in a new president, Lou Gerstner. He immediately called in his friends from McKinsey Company, one of the largest and most respected management consultancies in the world. He asked them to use their investigative skills to determine why IBM sales, market share, and profits were falling. They immediately went to work. In less than six months, the consultants were back. They assembled the senior executives and told them, "We have found your problem." They asked, "What is it?" The McKinsey consultants replied, "Low sales." The executives agreed that this was the problem and then asked, "What is the solution?" The McKinsey consultants said simply, "High sales." Again, the senior IBM executives pointed out that these two answers were obvious. But how would these high sales be achieved? The 75 Percent Rule

The answer became known as the "75 percent rule." In their research, they found that as the result of certain company policies, salespeople and sales managers were spending too much time in the office filling out forms and too little time in the field face-to-face with customers. They recommended that this situation be reversed immediately. The 75 percent rule simply said that from now on, the salespeople should spend 75 percent of their time in the field with customers talking about IBM products and services. In addition, the sales managers, who had been stuck in their offices most of the day processing the paperwork that the salespeople were generating, were to spend 75 percent of their time in the field with salespeople calling on key customers. Within a year, IBM's sales reversed completely. Huge losses turned into huge profits. The company turned around and again became a giant of American industry.

The Pivotal Skill At the end of this study, the McKinsey people explained their most important finding: In a sales-driven organization, the sales manager is the pivotal skill. Nothing will bring about faster and more predictable increases in sales performance and sales results than training sales managers to do their job more effectively. As a sales manager, you are the most important person in the sales-driven organization. You have more influence on the level of sales and, ultimately, the level of profitability of the company than almost any other person. You are vital to the success of the company. The sales manager is one of the most valuable and often one of the least appreciated executives in the company. It is the sales manager who sets the standards and quotas for the salespeople and sees that they achieve them. The development of excellent sales managers is an essential requirement for all successful business enterprises.
